

I really loved that film because it a documentary film but not a usual one. We can see the life of those people in the village and it was really shocking. We could also see the effect of the American movie makers on this village. It is hard to believe that many people live this kind of life in a country bordering on ours and they still can smile, too.

GERGELY ERDEI

The film judges the movie Borat, or rather what the movie did to the village, although this is mostly one of the underlying threads of the story.

I think we have to judge the film itself, too. In the end, all in all, it managed to present a lot of things. For example it could present the effects of globalization. From this aspect I do not think the film was polite enough to the villagers. It also showed the real world, where nobody is perfect, kind or honest and it did not make it attractive for us.

Anyway, I found the film interesting because I'd seen the movie Borat, too.

LILLA SIPOS

I did not see the end of the film, but the part I saw I liked because people in it were natural and true. But Carmen and all the others were dirty and moneyless and this is terrible. The story is interesting and I'm sorry I did not see the end. Really.

MITRA

For me the film was a little bit long but very interesting. It was shocking for me, because this life in the place where Carmen lives is terrible. The people are poor, everything is bad and dirty. In Hungary people always complain about everything, but I think if they should go and see this film and then they will see that their problems are nothing compared to those in the film. So I think this is film is a most educational one and all should see it.

N. SZILÁDI

I only saw the first 15 minutes, which showed Carmen's life in the village. I did not like it because I do not like documentary type films, but again, I did not see the whole film.

RÉKA

I didn't really like it but I liked that the subtitles were in English and some parts were directly in English. After I've seen this film I'm very grateful that I live in a clean place and not in such poverty as it was in the film. All in all, I felt very sorry for the villagers, because the Americans (as the film said) fucked them up and they were so helpless and could do nothing to defend themselves.

ERIK F.

I liked the film because it was interesting to see how people live in that little poor village. For me it was shocking to recognize that there are such places in the world in the 21st century.

ESZTER W.

After I'd seen this film I had mixed feelings and had a lot of questions in my head. I suspect most of those who saw the film had those questions, too. And this is why I liked the film: it made me think. The film had a slow pulse which was difficult to get used to in the beginning.

P. BAGAMÉRI

When I saw this movie I thought it was boring a little, but later I started to think about it and now, in my opinion, it is not that bad, only a bit too long. I sometimes laughed while I was watching it and I find this interesting. Although this is a documentary, it has a script, a director and main heroes, so it is like a kind of novel comedy for me. And I do not mind it.

GREGORY

All in all, I can say I did not like the film but there were some interesting parts. For example to see how the gypsies live there. But the film did not have a full, complete story. I had the impression that the director wanted to make a simple film about Carmen and then about what happened after the Borat people came and they thought it was enough material for a good documentary. I think not.

BALÁZS SABRANSZKY

I have mixed feelings about the film, but in general I think I liked it. I feel that it consists of different parts or something like that. On the other hand I think this film was a very novel type of documentary, which is very good. And it made a big impression on me.

BOLDIZSÁR

The film was horrible. I liked it but the story was sad. Everybody was disastrously poor in that small village. There were comical scenes but not too often. I think many people in the USA do not know that what the film shows is true and they think it is a big parody on the gypsies.

ANDRIS

The movie had an unusual topic which I had never met before. It was very interesting that it was not directed, it presented a real story, and this is why that it is very regrettable that in real life people can cheat and use badly other people this much.

RENÁTA CSILIGA

It's a strange film, I do not exactly know if it is bad or good. For me the moral of the film was that if somebody can be cheated, he will be cheated.

MÁRTON

This documentary film is the best documentary I've ever seen. When I saw the film I was thinking about how people can lie to each other and why people do not help each other. The only bad thing about the film was that I found it a bit too long.

TAMÁS TÓTH

I didn't like the film because it was too long and it did not say important things to me. Shortly, its topic did not touch me because I do not have problems like this and I do not like to imagine how badly people live in other parts of the world.
